Food poverty and consumption patterns in Kenya

by Joel Greer and Erik Thorbecke

Food is both a major source of employment and a key determinant of the incidence of poverty in developing countries. Policies to alleviate food poverty must therefore be based on a sound understanding of how food, employment and poverty are related to one another. This study suggests a new methodology for the measurement of food poverty and analyses in detail the pattern of food consumption and its determinants in Kenya. The authors then use their findings to trace the effects of one of the most widely advocated public policies – an increase in the relative price of food – on the production, income and consumption of various socio-economic groups in Kenyan society. This monograph makes a substantial contribution to the analysis of food poverty and can serve as a model for similar investigations in other developing countries.
